Lust For Youth, the Scandinavian duo of Hannes Norrvide and Malthe Fischer, is pleased to announce their new self-titled album, out June 7th via Sacred Bones Records. In conjunction with today’s announcement, they also share the lead single, “Great Concerns,” a pulsating track with synth-pop beats and detached vocals.

Pirouetting on decadence, meeting eyes with a dizzy sensation, falling and flying at the same time—Lust for Youth have continually held poise through the most vitalizing of times. Their new album, a self-titled collection of eight songs, is sure-footed where they had earlier feared to tread, and light-headed for a new set of reasons. The album is driven by a dance-pop agenda, hustling its way through upbeat peaks that level out into reflective ballads. While still taking clear cues from a crop of austere synth-pop, Lust for Youth sound brighter than they ever have before, taking tips from some of the flirtiest Eurobeat to aid their new direction.

Lust For Youth is the follow up to 2016's Compassion, an album that examined euphoria and contemporary life with a wry wit. Lust for Youth sees Norrvide and Fischer taking some familiar strides, though to another place. This album boasts brighter pop compositions that bustle with intricate production. No longer galvanizing us with hooks, but with a songcraft unhindered by anxiety, the album presents a cohesion not seen in the project until now. Lyrically, the apprehension still hangs like tinsel. Often garish and celebratory, the droll mischief is this time more pointed, more personal, and far more self-aware. A thread of reflections upon the state of the world is artfully wound throughout the album, casting a quiet force upon the detachment of Norrvide's vocals.

Lust for Youth have been one of love's most honest confrères, detailing the pangs of what is all too often a sullen process. On this occasion, they look up.
