"Encased in swirls of dream-pop production, [At the Party With My Brown Friends] represents a softer, more subtle sort of resistance." — NPR Music

"Paul is free, so long as she sings, to draw no lines around who she is and what she loves. . . She makes no apologies, feels no inadequacy. Over the course of [At the Party With My Brown Friends], this near-hour spent in the presence of the people she loves, she is reminded that she is equal to any challenge which may befall her." — Pitchfork

"Throughout [At the Party With My Brown Friends], her voice cascades gently, acting not just as a carrying case for emotion, but as a soothing instrument in itself. It's a transformation that makes Black Belt Eagle Scout sound more assured and driven, building off last year's breakout moment." – The AV Club

Black Belt Eagle Scout - moniker of Portland-based multi-instrumentalist Katherine Paul - announces a North American tour and releases a video for "I Said I Wouldn't Write This Song," off last year's At the Party With My Brown Friends. As described by Paul, the song "is about an initial thought that you don't think will come to fruition, but for whatever circumstances, does. It's about that kind of craving emotion within oneself that just turns up and has to come out of you no matter what."

Its animated video was edited and directed by Chantal Jung (Inujuk Nunatsiavutimi), and is meant to raise awareness of the Alaskan coastline and its deep connection with Indigenous people and animals. "The video features Northern imagery that shows aspects of Inuit life, including cloudberry picking, animal relatives and Arctic landscapes," describes Jung. "People often forget that our livelihoods are extremely connected to the environment, including the animals and plants that live among us. This video is meant to bring awareness of the land, the animals and the people who protect the land."
