Girl Talk, aka Pittsburgh-based producer Gregg Gillis, and Bas release a new single, “Fallin’.” This is their second collaborative track, following “Outta Pocket” for Dreamville’s *Revenge of the Dreamers III. “Fallin’” uses dynamic production - spacious layered synths, skittering hi-hats, and speaker-rattling 808s - to capture the haze of a late night drive. Bas’ delivery is ever-changing, jumping from rapid-fire double-time flows to spaced-out harmonies to a screwed-and-chopped breakdown.

“Bas came on my radar with his ‘Too High to Riot’ project in 2016. I was really into his range. He’s a technical rapper who also has an amazing melodic sense. It’s kind of difficult to define his style, which is something I always admire. When we connected, I had a wide variety of beats ready for him. This was the first one that I played, and he was off and running! There were a couple different tangential parts where he completely switched up the style of his vocals. For those sections, we ended up re-doing some of the arrangements and production on the spot. The whole thing came together quickly!"

"I first saw Girl Talk at Catalpa Music Festival in NYC in 2012. I said 'who's this dude that's blasting toilet paper everywhere?' But he has the festival rocking and it was my favorite set of the weekend. I started following him over the years and thought he was great, but didn't know he was also a producer too," comments Bas. "Fast-forward, we ended up linking up and he had BANGERS. We had great chemistry and started making songs instantly. This experience has been a real fiend full circle story! Really excited to share this record with the world!"
