The artist-curated mix series, Late Night Tales, will release Jordan Rakei's compilation on April 9th. Today, they present one of the mix's exclusive tracks, “Imagination,” which follows Rakei's previously released cover of Jeff Buckley's “Lover, You Should've Come Over.” “Imagination” opens with dark, sweeping, arpeggiated piano, with Rakei singing lyrics that he and his wife originally conceived as a spoken word piece. “It's a story about going into the night,” says Rakei. “Dreams are a place where you can explore endless possibilities of imagination.”

For Rakei's Late Night Tales, the first mix of the acclaimed series' 20th year, the 28-year-old modern soul icon effortlessly stamps his own jazz and hip-hop driven sound all over this gorgeous array of handpicked tracks. A beautifully layered blend that is mirrored in the music he's made, it comes as no surprise that such a supremely gifted songwriter should deliver a mix that is all about the song.

As Rakei says, there's so much more to the song selection on his Late Night Tales' than a random collection of artists. Many selections have a personal connection.

This year, Late Night Tales* celebrates its 20th anniversary. The series was established back in 2001 with Fila Brazilia taking to the controls and mixing up the first of what would continue to be the first choice of music connoisseurs worldwide. Since then, the series has seen releases from the likes of The Flaming Lips, Floating Points, David Holmes, Bonobo, Jon Hopkins, Röyksopp and many more.
