“an album of subtle electronic pop, driving bass lines, and lyrics that veer from quixotic to inspiring”
- Aquarium Drunkard

Anika shares new music for the first time since the release of her new album, Change (out now on Sacred Bones), ahead of her North American headline tour next month with live musicians Sally Wanda Whitton (bass, vox), Eilis Kiera Frawley (drums), and Zoey Rosa Agro (keys, vox). Tickets are on sale now here. The cover of Psychic TV’s “Godstar” appears on Sacred Bones' Todo Muere SBXV compilation out May 27th, and was recorded in tribute to the late Genesis Breyer P-Orridge, one of Anika's biggest inspirations.

"Psychic TV, specifically the album Orchids, has been a huge influence on my music and human psyche over this musical life," says Anika. "[Genesis] is a big inspiration, the humor and investigation element in their work. I remember going to a talk in NYC where G recommended that no-one finish art school. I like this concept. Perhaps it leaves things unfinished and room for the individual to grow shoots, continue on their own journey. Perhaps this is like music school or any creative school. I think G specifically thought the place was bull and that they could do it better on their own terms, which turned out great. They also told a story about an art school work, which involved a used tampon in the shell of a clock. It was called Period Piece. I like the humor in this piece and the deconstruction of social boundaries. They are for sure an inspiration, in how to do things your own way, carve out your own path and don't worry too much about what other people are doing."
